In 1769, Spanish Governor Pedro Fermin de Mendinueta made the San Joaquin del Nacimiento land grant to 35 pioneering families who had settled the headwaters of the Rio Puerco in 1766. The community was later abandoned, owing to raids by frontier Native American tribes, but was resettled in the late 1870s. Originally known as Nacimiento, or La Laguna, it was renamed Cuba when the post office was established in 1887.

Na'azisi To' (Gophers' Water) is the Navajo place name for Cuba. Since the 11th century, this wilderness area of the Upper Puerco was used by subsistence cultures – the Apache, Navajo, and Pueblo people. This region is located within the Navajo Four Sacred mountains, and many landforms are representative of characters in rich lore for our cultures. Today, we continue weaving our ancestors' cultural fabrics of language and traditions into our daily lives.

Cabezon Peak

Nestled against the Sierra Nacimiento on the western border of the Santa Fe National Forest, Cuba, New Mexico, sits atop the Continental Divide at 6,900 feet. Home to nearly 750 residents, this diverse gateway community is a hidden gem tucked between notable cultural hubs and recreational hot spots of the enchanted high desert and Four Corners region.
